

Commentary on the Gospel for Tue, Oct 11th 2011

People are image-conscious and concerned with how they appear in front of other people. In a society where people are being judged from external; the way they look and the dress they wear; people are also investing on what will make them look good and pleasant to the eyes of the society. The eyes of God however are eyes that look beyond the externals. His are eyes that look directly into the hearts of people. Isn't it wise to invest instead on what will make our hearts look good and pleasant in the eyes of God? How about extending a hand to a neighbor in need today? That will be a good investment.
